Below is the plant list for 2023. This list represents what has been planted although not everything has germinated yet. There has been some slow germination this season due to a cold and gray March. This is the first year I am not going to Union Square or any other markets and in order to maintain the broadest selection we had to plant less of each variety. So come early to find your favorites. While many of these plants are still too tender to go in the ground, they can do well on a sunny windowsill until their planting time comes. Unfortunately we cannot reserve any plants for a later pick up.

Among the saddest of the germination stories this year are the peppers. We are constantly experimenting with new methods and varieties but this year the results are disappointing. The surviving pepper list is not yet included here. I'll update this list and post to Instagram when we know which varieties have pulled through.

The squash, melons and pumpkins and some other late flowers will be on an updated list as the seedlings are planted. Watch for it on Instagram.

I hope everyone has a great spring and summer garden season. Thank you all for your support, I am happy to be in the nursery full time this season.

I couldn't do this without you!

Jeffrey

Tomatoes

Tomatoes are grouped by size. This list may need to be edited as we proceed with transplanting the tomatoes up from our seedling trays to 2" pots.

The number of days refers to an estimate of the time it takes from the day you plant them in the ground to the first fruit. Please be sure to check your zone for your last frost date.

D/I refers to Determinate vs Indeterminate. A determinate tomato sets all of its fruit at one time. Indeterminate tomatoes continue to grow and fruit on vines until frost or blight knocks them out.

H refers to the approximate height of the tomato plant.
